About the time that this issue is delivered from the printer and readied for mailing, IUP will celebrate its fourth annual Diversity Day. A highlight of the day is the filling of a big room in the Hadley Union Building with exhibits and displays that reflect the many and varied cultural backgrounds of IUP students from both inside and outside the U.S.

Because they are a substantial part of this magazine's readership, I encourage parents of students to in turn encourage their sons' and daughters' active participation in Diversity Day each year. But far beyond a yearly celebration, students should be encouraged day to day to take advantage of what may be a once-in-a-lifetime chance to get to know, and to know well, people from other cultures and other countries.

The Malaysian students featured in this issue of the magazine are only a few of the international students at IUP. The patience and generosity they showed in allowing us to spend time with them is characteristic of many of the students from other countries. Enlarging one's world by becoming friends with them is an enormous benefit of life at the university and in the Indiana community.

For the fifth time in its three years of life, IUP Magazine has been honored with a national award. The cover illustration of the Winter-Spring issue was selected for an award of excellence from Communications Concepts. Ironically, the illustration was produced by Kwang Liew—a former Malaysian student at IUP and the brother of the designer of the cover of this issue. Thanks, Kwang.

Meet Dr. Pettit

Lawrence K. Pettit, IUP's twenty-first president, was born in Montana on May 2, 1937. A 1959 graduate of the University of Montana, he received a master's degree in political science from Washington University in St. Louis and a Ph.D. degree in political science from the University of Wisconsin.

Larry and Libby Pettit

John Bender

Pettit's first academic post was as an associate professor of political science at Penn State, and his second was as chairman of the political science department at Montana State University. Throughout his life, from a year as a Congressional legislative assistant after college to a run for a seat in Congress himself in 1980, he has been a student of politics.

Pettit brings to IUP years of experience in educational leadership above the presidential level, yet this is the first time he has been a campus president. Three times, in Montana, in Texas, and in Illinois, he has served as chancellor of multicampus systems. He has also been a senior fellow with the American Council of Education (which years before he served as associate director of government relations) and deputy commissioner for academic programs of the Texas College and University System Coordinating Board.

Married to Elizabeth DuBois Pettit, he and his wife between them have seven children, all of whom are grown. The Pettits live in the President's Apartment in John Sutton Hall but also have a vacation residence just outside Missoula, Mont. 🐾

While controversy today swirls around the name of IUP's athletic teams, at least one Native American played a prominent role in the university's sports history.

One can only imagine the talk generated back in 1911 when the new football coach arrived at Indiana Normal School. It must have been lively.

Not because Frank Mt. Pleasant had been an All-American running back and quarterback in college or had participated in the 1908 Olympics. Not because he was a law school graduate or was regarded as an accomplished pianist. Not even because he was, at twenty-three, hardly older than his players.

Any conversation likely centered on the fact that Mt. Pleasant was a Native American.

Today it seems fitting that a university so linked with Native Americans—a school whose athletic teams are known as the Indians and whose buildings are located in a town named in honor of the area's first inhabitants—would hire someone raised on a reservation. But these were different times. In 1911, the INS faculty and students, which then numbered less than a thousand, formed a homogeneous population. Could a man born into the Tuscarora tribe fit in?

Judging from his coaching record at Indiana, Mt. Pleasant's acceptance followed on the heels of his hiring.

The Normals were a sparkling 23-4-1 during his three seasons at the helm, an .839 percentage that ranked Mt. Pleasant second all-time among the school's coaches at the beginning of the 1992 season. But it wasn't his ability so much as his affability that likely disarmed any detractors he might have encountered initially.

"As a man, Mt. Pleasant is a frank, open-hearted gentleman, quiet and courteous," notes a long-ago profile in the Baseball Magazine, which lauded his off-the-field demeanor as much as his various on-the-field exploits. "To meet Mt. Pleasant is to like him; to know him is to admire him; to live in the same little world with him is to appreciate his sterling qualities and his noble nature."

Mt. Pleasant, who was born in 1888 on the Tuscarora reservation just outside Niagara Falls, N.Y., came to INS via tiny Carlisle Indian School, which produced some of the nation's premier football teams just after the turn of the century. Carlisle regularly challenged the powers of the day—Pitt, Penn State, Harvard, Army, and Penn—and usually prevailed. In 1907, Mt. Pleas-ant's last season in the Carlisle uniform, the Indians rolled past ten of their eleven foes and were ranked fifth in the nation.

The genius behind this juggernaut was one Glenn "Pop" Warner, the fourth-winningest coach (313 victories) in collegiate history and a member of the College Football Hall of Fame along with one of Mt. Pleasant's successors in the Indians' backfield, Jim Thorpe. Carlisle officials hired Warner at the then-outrageous salary of $1,200, his mission to develop a program that would bring the school national acclaim. Mission accomplished.

"Under Warner, football became big business at Carlisle. His teams, which played most of the time on the road, taking the measure of almost every big university in the country, traveled as far as California and raised large sums of money for the school," noted Margaret Christman in the book Champions of American Sport.

Mt. Pleasant spent four distinguished seasons at Carlisle, earning second-team All-America honors in 1905. While he was an exceptional all-around player, he was most feared as a ball carrier. He brought defenders to their knees and spectators to their feet with an array of elusive moves that made him as difficult to grasp as a watermelon seed.

According to one early account, "To see him run with the ball is worth the price of admittance: such dodging, twisting, and squirming, and such magnificent speed! He can kick with the best, is a sure tackle, and gives an exhibition of skill and headwork rarely witnessed."

Perhaps even more impressive than Mt. Pleasant's accomplishments was his response to them.

"He is exceedingly modest in regard to his athletic ability, and if you ask him in regard to it, you will experience the famed taciturnity of the American Indian," noted the Baseball Magazine story.

After Mt. Pleasant gained renown on a national level in football, his track skills catapulted him onto the international scene. Few months after graduating from Carlisle, he represented the United States at the 1908 Olympic Games in London.

Mt. Pleasant leaped 22 feet, 4-1/2 inches, to finish sixth in the long jump and placed sixth in the triple jump with a 45-10 effort. He narrowly missed a medal in each event, falling 10-1/2 inches short in the triple jump. Had Mt. Pleasant not been hampered by a strained ligament, it's conceivable he could have medaled in both events.

Mt. Pleasant did gain a measure of redemption soon after the London Games, when he defeated fellow American Frank Irons, the newly crowned Olympic long jump champion, in a meet at Paris. What's more, he established a new French record in the process.

Upon his return from Europe, Mt. Pleasant entered the Dickinson School of Law, located across the street from his old classrooms at Carlisle. He graduated in 1910, played some minor league baseball in Michigan, coached briefly at Franklin and Marshall College in Lancaster, and then was offered the job at Indiana Normal.

Whether Mt. Pleasant's arrival at INS caused a stir is unknown from this distance of eighty-one years. His first team certainly didn't: the Normals quietly plodded their way through a 5-3-1 season, a step backwards after the previous year's 6-2 record.

But at least Mt. Pleasant made a positive impression in his new post, if the following commentary by John Smith in the Normal Herald is any indication: "As a coach he is ideal. He is tactful but resourceful; a diplomat in handling men; pleasant and agreeable in his dealings with them, but rules with an iron hand when necessary."

The players responded enthusiastically to that approach. Soon Indiana was winning as frequently as Mt. Pleasant's old Carlisle teams. INS captured state normal school championships in 1912 and 1913 and reeled off fifteen consecutive victories in one stretch, a school record that still stands.

The 1912 season was especially remarkable. Indiana finished 9-0—the winningest perfect season in the 102-year history of IUP football—and thrashed its three normal school opponents, California (69-0), Slippery Rock (54-0), and Mansfield (40-0).

The 1913 squad was almost as invincible. Indiana shut out its first six foes before suffering a 31-7 loss to perennial nemesis Kiski, the only blot in a 9-1 season.

Mt. Pleasant moved on to West Virginia Wesleyan for the 1914 campaign. He lost his debut game to a very familiar opponent—Carlisle Indian School—but the Bobcats rebounded to finish 4-3 and claimed the unofficial state championship on the strength of wins over West Virginia and Marshall.

Mt. Pleasant coached Wesleyan again in 1915, but WWV records don't record whether he stayed the whole season. Some time before the close of the year, he returned home to New York State because of his father's serious illness.

The details of Mt. Pleasant's life after West Virginia are as murky as the Mississippi. Until April 12, 1937,

The 1912 season was especially remarkable. Indiana finished 9-0—the winningest perfect season in the 102-year history of IUP football—and thrashed its three normal school opponents, California (69-0), Slippery Rock (54-0), and Mansfield (40-0).

Living On

by Shari Trinkley

Life is a journey, filled with passion and heartache, frustration and determination. This is the story of one man's journey: a journey that led him from his home to the misfortunes of war, to the quest for knowledge, to the wilds of Alaska, and to the discovery of the wonders of the world. But no matter where his journeys took him, all roads led back to a place he learned to call home: Indiana State Teachers College.

Our story begins in the small Western Pennsylvania community of Ehrenfeld. Located not far from Johnstown, Ehrenfeld is like thousands of small towns dotting the United States. It has its secrets and its favorite son: movie star tough-guy Charles Bronson. However, the subject of our story is neither a movie star nor a corporate mogul. He is a retired elementary school teacher: Alan Royce Anderson, "Hoby" to his family and friends.

The third of five sons born to Margaret and Franklin "Dean" Anderson, Hoby enjoyed a rather boisterous childhood. Playing sports and running around town with his brothers and friends occupied most of his time. School was just something he had to do.

"I wasn't a genius," Anderson admits with a wink. "I was a football player."

Knowing his lack of enthusiasm for academics wouldn't improve in time, Hoby decided to quit school after the football season in his junior year. He moved to Philadelphia to find work, but that didn't last long. World War II was sweeping across Europe and the Pacific. So, following the footsteps of many other young men, Hoby, then just seventeen, lied about his age and enlisted in the Navy. He served for thirty-three months during the height of the war.

Upon his discharge, Anderson faced a bleak future. "I knew I wouldn't get anywhere without an education," he said. "I didn't want to get stuck in the mines back home. That was hard work. I also knew I had to do better than what I did in the Navy. Going back to school was the only decision I could make."

He promptly enrolled in Veterans High School in Johnstown to make up the high school credits he missed. Upon his graduation from Veterans High School, he made plans to enroll in a vocational institute in Williamsport to study drafting. But, his plans changed at the urging of a few friends.

"I ended up at Indiana State Teachers College (ISTC) because some buddies talked me into it," Anderson said, shaking his head in amazement at his motivation.

It was 1947 when Anderson walked onto the campus—thanks to his friends Joe Dutkosky and Jack Joll and the G.I. Bill. He moved into the old Elkin House (now Breezedale) with twenty-one other men and began to live college life.

Tales of notorious water battles and other pranks and practical jokes flood Anderson's memory of those early days at ISTC. He also fondly recalls his glorious days on the football team as a 155-pound lineman. Although his normal position was on the bench during most of the season, he claims his finest moment came during the team photograph. He sat in front of Billy Hunter, the team's star quarterback who went on to fame and fortune in major league baseball.

As in high school, fun and games were the priority in Anderson's college career, and academics followed, a distant second. However, within a few months he learned he needed to reverse his priorities if he was going to have any chance at a future away from the coal mines and steel mills of western Pennsylvania.

"I wasn't a genius, but I was pretty stubborn and I was determined to do something worthwhile with my life," Anderson admitted. "Thanks to my friends and my own stubbornness, I was able to get on track and concentrate on my studies."

In addition to his hometown friends, Anderson was heavily influenced by another member of the campus community—Doris Collins, a beautiful coed who worked the campus switchboard.

"I remember the first time I saw her, I fell in love," he said softly. Love at first sight led to marriage on October 9, 1948, while both were sophomores. They eloped to Winchester, Virginia, using his father's car and his mother as a chaperone.

With Doris, Anderson discovered a passion and a purpose for his life. He wanted to be a good husband and provider—to accomplish that, he needed to be a good teacher. To support his new wife, Anderson stocked groceries at the Acme Market and bused tables at Deeds Restaurant—while maintaining a full course load in school. His persistence—and Doris's gentle prodding—enabled him to graduate with his bachelor's degree in education in January, 1950. Doris graduated five months later.

Filled with the enthusiasm of youth, the Andersons made an extraordinary decision. They chose to begin their teaching careers in Alaska with the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the U.S. Department of the Interior. One reason for this move was to enjoy the adventure of a new land. Another was purely economic: the salary for teachers in Pennsylvania was $2,200 a year; in Alaska, it was $3,875.

That first year as teachers, the Andersons found themselves in the Unalakleet Day School, one of ninety-six schools operated by the Alaska Native Services, a branch of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Four teachers were assigned to this particular school with nearly a hundred students. Doris taught second and third grades, while Hoby taught the fourth and fifth.

All the children in the school were Eskimo, except for two who were with their missionary parents. "Another kid was half-Eskimo and half-Coast Guard, according to his grandmother," Anderson recalled. "They were great kids, every single one of them."

Although all the children in the school spoke English and were eager to learn, the Andersons discovered that teaching them was somewhat difficult with inadequate resources.

"Teaching was sometimes very tough, because we were using American textbooks, and the children couldn't relate to things such as skyscrapers and cars," Anderson explained. "We were 100 miles from the Arctic Circle and those things didn't exist in their world."

Unalakleet was cut off from the outside world most months of the year. The village comprised wooden cabins braced against the Arctic chill. The dogsled was the basic form of transportation. Fashionable dress took a backseat to warm parkas and boots. Meals were made of whale meat, salmon, and berries along with the few provisions purchased from the annual delivery of goods for the village cooperative store.

When "Alaska's Wild West" was profiled in an article, a photograph of Doris in her classroom appeared in the July, 1952, issue of National Geographic.

Despite the Arctic chill and the barren land, the Andersons loved Alaska. The heartwarming smiles of the Eskimo children were enough to warm the icy temperatures. The Andersons were pleased to be providing a real service to the Eskimo community, especially for the children. They had planned to stay at least three years in this frozen wonderland; however, a family illness forced them to return to Ehrenfeld after their first year.

Hoby went to work in one of the Johnstown steel mills for a few months. He had a family to feed as he and Doris became the parents of a son—Jacque Colin Anderson. Then, at the urging of a friend in Michigan, the young family moved to Detroit in hopes of renewing their teaching careers.

"Doris had an interview almost immediately after we arrived," Anderson noted. "I went with her and was standing in the hallway, holding Jacque, who was almost six months old. The principal came out of the office with Doris. He asked what I did. I told him I was a teacher, too. He hired me on the spot. It was a two-for-one deal that lasted more than thirty years," he added with a laugh.

Doris taught the youngsters—kindergarten, second, and third grades. Hoby had the older students, teaching fifth grade for seventeen years and then junior high for the sixteen years more. He loved teaching—so much, in fact, that he missed just three days during his entire tenure as a teacher.

“Teaching was easier than making lesson plans for a substitute,” he admitted. “Besides, the kids kept me young. They were always asking questions or carrying on about something. I loved them, but I was always ready for summer vacation.”

During those summer vacation months, the Anderson family traveled extensively, partly for fun, partly to satisfy Hoby’s interest in geography and history. They toured most of the United States, preferring to canoe and camp rather than stay in what Anderson calls “fancy hotels.” They also traveled to Europe, stopping in small villages and camping in the surrounding woods.

“We saw the usual tourist sights, but we also got to know the countries and the cultures by visiting with people in the small towns,” Anderson said. “It was an education in humanity—not just a vacation.”

The Andersons’ passion for learning and teaching was passed on to their son, Jacques. A good student when challenged—even if his father had to escort him to the principal’s office in fifth grade for breaking a pencil in anger—Jacques enrolled at Central Michigan University and earned a bachelor’s degree in drafting. He continued with his studies at Michigan State University, receiving a master’s degree in education. All told, Jacques had earned 321 college credits.

Following in his parents’ footsteps, Jacques taught elementary and high school classes for fifteen years before he was killed in a highway accident in 1989 at the age of thirty-eight. The tragedy shattered the Andersons’ lives. Doris and Hoby had retired in 1983 when Jacques had been hospitalized for more than two hundred days, enduring extensive surgery for a heart ailment. They had lived through that heartache, but it had not prepared them for the heartbreak of losing their only child six years later.

“His mother and I were very proud of Jacques,” Anderson said with tears in his eyes. “He was a very considerate and conscientious young man. It’s difficult without him. Even talking about him is still very hard for me.”

As they had done for many years, the Andersons got through the difficult time by relying on each other. They continued to travel and visit with friends across the country. They were on their way to see some old friends in Titusville, Pa., when Doris suffered a stroke and fell into a coma. She died eleven days later, on October 11, 1990.

Left alone, Hoby felt lost. He was consoled by his memories, especially of his early days with Doris at Indiana State Teachers College. He decided to venture back to the campus in May, 1991, just to live again in memory a few happy moments. After this visit, Anderson decided to do something for the school that he believed had given him so much: he made provisions in his will to create a scholarship fund to benefit elementary education majors at IUP.

“Teaching had been very good to my family,” he said. It was rewarding financially and emotionally. I decided to create the scholarship because I wanted to do something for my family—have some type of legacy in their memory to honor the more than seventy years of combined teaching experience we shared. I know Doris and Jacques would be very proud and supportive of this scholarship.”

Although he still lives in Michigan, Anderson has adopted IUP and Indiana as almost a second home. He visits the campus whenever he’s back in Pennsylvania and is pleased that his alma mater continues to offer other young adults the opportunities he received more than forty years ago.

“I always told my students that I quit school without graduating, and it was tough,” he said in a soft, fatherly voice. “I returned to school, and even though I didn’t have the best grades, I proved that I could do something good with my life. I hope some of my kids learned from my example.”

Hoby’s journey isn’t quite over. He returned to Pennsylvania in July to celebrate what would have been his fiftieth high school class reunion at South Fork High School. There, he encountered Betty Spittal, the object of his first crush when both were twelve years old. Not long before press time, a phone call came from Hoby, announcing that they would be married soon. 🐾

Drawn to the U.S. by the quality of its higher education opportunities, students from around the world taste American life for a few years before going home again. The word gets around—in many languages. (Photos by John Bender)

Sai Hup Tan, left, and Pearly Yap are both from Malaysia's capital city of Kuala Lumpur but didn't meet until they came to IUP. Sai Hup received an undergraduate degree in Finance last December and is now a candidate for an M.B.A. Pearly graduated last spring in Human Resources Management.

Mariam Nazarudin will graduate in May in Human Resources Management. Malaysia, like the U.S., is a nation that comprises various ethnic and cultural groups. Mariam is Malay, while most Malaysian students at IUP, like the others in these photos, are Chinese.

Malaysian students are one example. Five years ago, there were only a few at IUP. Today, they compose the university's third largest international contingent. Their Association of Malaysian Students is the only group of its kind officially recognized by Student Congress and the Office of Student Activities and Organizations.

According to Karen Chickos, acting director of the university's Office of International Services, "The international student population gives our campus a depth and richness of cultural diversity. Many of our American students first meet someone from another culture when they come to IUP. They experience ideas, values, and perceptions that are far different from their own. Isn't that what a university education is supposed to be?"

The university encourages full participation of international students in the life of the university. But students far from home, sometimes not even going there to visit for as long as five years at a time, understandably enjoy the company of compatriots.

Sharing a Malaysian meal means hours of preparation: sometimes ingredients, such as a special curry-like powder, have to be ordered from Malaysia or bought in Pittsburgh. Main dishes shown clockwise from top are curry puffs, curry chicken, and, at bottom, Nasi Lemak—rice cooked with coconut milk, anchovies, and onions.

'So Mad You Could Bite'

At last May's Commencement ceremonies in Miller Stadium, nearly three thousand graduates and their guests heard Fred Rogers tell them to "think of the children first."

"If you have anything to do with their food, toys, custody, day care, health care, or education, think of the children first. Listen to them. Learn from them."

That suggestion is at the core of Rogers's own success. He listens to people, regardless of their age, and is eager to learn from them.

"Ben Franklin, speaking at the close of the Continental Congress, said the older he became, the less he relied on his own infallibility," Rogers said in an interview. "He lived long enough to change his opinions on some things and pay more respect to the judgments of others. I like that."

Rogers offers people his undivided attention. He chats comfortably with his young viewers, as if they were sharing the sofa with him on the set where "Mister Rogers' Neighborhood" is produced at WQED in Pittsburgh.

He is candid about emotions, even those adults hesitate discussing. "People need to find healthy ways to vent anger," he said. "That's one of the most important things we talk about on the Neighborhood. A little boy once asked me, 'What do you do with the mad that you feel, when you feel so mad you could bite?' I wrote a song based on that question."

How does this author, lecturer, minister, musician, and Emmy Award-winning actor maintain his sense of serenity in the midst of a demanding schedule? Before answering, he characteristically paused for a moment and then replied, "I think of my Grandmother McFeely. When everything got very loud and very busy, she would begin to speak more slowly and softly, until everyone listened to her, and everything would seem to slow down a bit."

Kids relate to Mister Rogers, who seems to have inherited his grandmother's tranquil approach to living. Unlike a magical illusion, his popularity endures because he respects children and values what they offer adults.

"We need to take time for them," he said. "Children know when you love and care about them. And they know when you don't."

Silver Dollars

Twenty-five years ago this fall, the Foundation for IUP was formed to promote the educational purposes of the university by encouraging private monetary gifts. The founders included those with names prominent in the university's history: Willis Pratt, Mary Alice St. Clair, John Davis, Samuel Furgiuele, Charles Leach, and Joseph Serene.

During its quarter-century of life, the foundation has supported a myriad of programs and projects at the university. This support has been made possible by the generosity of alumni, parents of students, past and present university employees, community friends, businesses, and private foundations. Providing funds to support everything from student scholarships and faculty development to building renovations and equipment purchases, the foundation has aided in fulfilling the university's educational mission for all students.

Under the current leadership of Wallace Putt, president of the foundation's Board of Directors, and Charles Agnew, recently appointed executive director, the foundation hopes to celebrate this academic year more than just the silver anniversary of its incorporation. Expectations are to raise more than $2 million to support the university's needs that extend beyond the state budget allocation.

"As an institution of national significance, IUP will require increasing levels of support from both the public and private sectors," Agnew said. "The entire development team is eager to work with our various constituencies to advance excellence at the university and to strengthen the leadership position that IUP holds within the American higher education community."

Corporate Cooperation

A new IUP program will link the corporate world and the university in an annual giving campaign to encourage financial assistance from business and industry.

"The Corporate Associates Program is an excellent opportunity to establish ongoing private support for the university," said Dr. Lawrence Pettit, IUP president. "It offers a significant level of involvement and participation from representatives of the companies for which we prepare so many of our graduates."

By pledging a minimum of $2,500 annually, Corporate Associates will receive framed certificates and be accorded privileges and courtesies designed specifically to meet the professional, educational, and social interests of the group.

Barbara Ender, IUP director of corporate and foundation relations, will coordinate the program's activities. She said similar partnership programs have been implemented effectively at universities across the country. More information may be obtained by calling Ender at (412) 357-5661 or by writing her at 301 John Sutton Hall.

IUP in My Life

If you sit quietly and close your eyes, you can still hear them. The sweet whine of a violin. The joyful noise of a clarinet. The spellbinding tales of an American folk hero. The power and perfection of a piano.

Fisher Auditorium has echoed with these sounds, produced by some of the greatest performers in the world—Itzhak Perlman, Richard Stoltzman, Hal Holbrook as Mark Twain, and Andre Watts. And one woman is responsible for bringing all these remarkable artists to IUP—Florence Helwig Beezer.

In 1987, she established the Wilfred E. Helwig Distinguished Artist Series to perpetuate the memory of her late husband, a noted Indiana businessman and philanthropist. Her gift—one of the largest ever received by the Foundation for IUP—created an endowment which provides the annual funds for this outstanding performance program.

"I felt my late husband should be recognized, and this was an opportunity to do so," she explained. "Wilfred did many good things in this town and I didn't want anyone twenty years from now asking, 'Wilfred who?' The Helwig Distinguished Artist Series provided a wonderful way to honor Wilfred as well as help IUP and the community."

Ordinarily, people from Indiana and the surrounding area would have to travel to Pittsburgh and face the expense of hefty ticket and parking prices to experience performances of this caliber. After the performance, there would be a long drive home late at night. "Now, you can see the show for very little money and be home in ten minutes," she said.

"I could have chosen to create a scholarship fund to benefit one or two people each year, but I wanted to do something everyone could enjoy," she added. "I wanted to do something to bring the university and the Indiana community together."

In 1989, she married William Beezer, a childhood friend from Punxsutawney. Together, they remain active supporters of IUP and the Helwig Distinguished Artist Series.

A list of past performances reveals the donor's passion for classical music. "However, I love just about anything that takes you out of your ordinary, everyday existence for a while," she said.

Hal Holbrook and Andre Watts have been her favorite series participants so far. "Andre was very effervescent," she noted. "Hal was very down to earth. He was so interested about Indiana and the people he met here. I sent him a review from the local paper and received a very nice note from him, saying how much he enjoyed the performance and the dinner we had for him."

The next performance in the Helwig Distinguished Artist Series features Brian Bedford in "The Lunatic, the Lover, and the Poet"—a one-man stage show celebrating Shakespeare's life and works. The performance is scheduled for February 23 in Fisher Auditorium.

"A lot of wonderful programs and talent come to IUP for everyone to enjoy," she said. "I remember when I was in Scotland, I met two teachers from the United States. I mentioned that I was on my way home to Indiana, Pennsylvania, to see William F. Buckley, Jr., the speaker for the Sam and Nell Jack Distinguished American Lecture Series. They just couldn't believe that a university in a small town could attract such talent. I often think how impressed they'd be if they also knew about the Helwig Distinguished Artist Series."

Retired Faculty Spotlight

by S. Trevor Hadley '37

This is a story about a true IUP family: Charles "Charley" Davis and Clarabel

"Tweed" Davis. The Davises met as undergraduates when Charley was a member of a dance band that played for Saturday night dances in John Sutton Hall's Blue Room.

Charley Davis, as everyone at Indiana knew him, was born in New Kensington, Pa., where he attended high school. Later, he earned his B.S. degree at IUP and an M.A. at New York University and took further graduate work at the University of Colorado and the Juilliard School of Music in New York City.

After graduating from Indiana in 1934, Charley taught vocal and instrumental music at Parnassus Junior High School for several years before moving up to New Kensington Senior High School and then, in September, 1942, to IUP.

Charley taught music theory at IUP, but his teaching career at Indiana was quickly interrupted when he was drafted into the Army in December of that same year. He served with the Army Transportation Corps but was transferred to New Orleans and was assigned to the Army Band.

Besides the innumerable Army parades and the task of entertaining troops in and out of the country, Charley played with an Army dance band that was in much demand both in New Orleans and at service dances. It was at this time that Charley and Tweed saw their first Mardi Gras, because Tweed had joined Charley and was working in New Orleans for Owens Corning Fiberglas.

In 1945, Charley was discharged and returned to IUP and to his teaching position in the music department. This was the beginning of a long and popular career at Indiana.

Charley taught music theory, arranged music for the Indiana Marching Band directed by Dan DiCicco, directed the Indiana Chorale, organized and directed the Men's Glee Club and the Four Chiefs, one of Indiana's better-known music groups. In addition, Charley will always be years of work with Swing Out, and in 1988, the university recognized his contributions with a President's Medal of Distinction.

Charley served as a faculty representative to the board of the Foundation for IUP for many years; after his retirement, he continued to serve on the board as a representative of the alumni association.

Tweed was born in Punxsutawney, earned her bachelor's degree in music education and, like Charley, obtained a master's degree from NYU. She first worked at Cochran, Pa., where she taught all grades, one through twelve. Later, she was a music supervisor in the Mt. Lebanon schools and taught vocal music at Marion Center High School. Eventually, she followed Charley to IUP and served as a supervising teacher at the University School for eleven years until her retirement.

Today, the Davises live on a forty-acre farm north of Indiana. For several years, they owned harness horses (trotters and pacers), racing them primarily at county fairs across the state. It was lots of fun but quite expensive, and now their "stable" consists of a single horse.

Charley and Tweed have traveled extensively across Europe and in Japan, Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and most of the U.S. Ever since his Army experience in New Orleans, Charley has disdained winter weather, and now the Davises spend about six months of the year on Florida's Gulf Coast.

Charley and Tweed would enjoy hearing from some of the former students and associates who made their years at IUP so happy. Their address is 8 Tanoma Road, Home, PA 15747.

part of the Indiana tradition, as he and Bob Ensley produced the highly successful Swing Out shows, which became the campus's best-known productions for twenty-eight years.

During his years at Indiana, Charley was recognized with several awards. The Student Council presented him with one of the first "Little Indian" awards in 1962. The IUP Alumni Association honored him with an alumni citation for his thirty that is. A hit-and-run driver killed Mt. Pleasant in Buffalo, not far from his birthplace. He didn't even live to see fifty.

Despite the brevity of his life, Mt. Pleasant packed a century's worth of achievements into it. That fact was confirmed in 1973 when he was enshrined in the American Indian Hall of Fame.

Mt. Pleasant departed INS with a record that, eight decades later, still ranks among the best in the history of the school's football program. His chief legacy is unquestionably the perfect season of 1912, for that's where the man who gained fame as an athlete demonstrated that he could also excel as a coach. Indiana won a record nine games (not until the 1968 Boardwalk Bowl team would an IUP squad duplicate that feat) and outscored its over-matched opponents 340-13.

What's ironic is that so little had been expected of the Normals, whose lack of experience seemed to portend a lack of success.

"At the beginning of the season, prospects for a good football team were very dim, as there were only three men of last year's team back," noted the 1913 Instano, the school yearbook. "But under Mt. Pleasant's care and guidance, a team was whipped into shape that will go down in Indiana's history as one of the greatest she ever had." 🐾

Bob Fulton's glimpses into the university's sports past for IUP Magazine have ranged throughout the twentieth century. His last story, in the Winter-Spring issue, centered on sixties' basketball great Mel Hankinson.

Going the Distance

by Al King

One of singer-songwriter Billy Joel's first monster hits was "Piano Man," a ballad about a musician and the regulars he met while playing in a small bar. The gist of the piece is that a man who could tickle the ivories could make people "forget about life for a while."

Ed Fry asks a lot of his runners but gives them even more: pride, perseverance, and a positive addiction that lasts a lifetime.

IUP's Piano Man does just the opposite. He makes people look at life for a while, learning ways to cope with it and survive its ups and downs. Ed Fry has been teaching piano in the IUP music department and coaching runners at IUP for twenty-six years. His students, in music and in athletics, have learned valuable lessons—lessons about pride and perseverance.

"Some track coaches look at you like they own you for four years," said Don Slusser, an NAIA All-American and 1973 IUP graduate. "They try to get the most out of you. But running is a lifetime thing. I never felt burnt out at IUP. That's the big difference between Ed and other track coaches."

There are several other differences, too. One of the biggest is Fry's success rate. He's coached men's track and field and cross country for twenty-six years, women's track and field for fourteen years, and women's cross country for thirteen years.

Fry started both of the women's programs at IUP. The women's cross country team has won the Pennsylvania Conference championship seven times in twelve years and has never placed lower than third.

Eight men and four women have earned All-America status in cross country. The 1977 men's team and 1985 women's team were also tabbed as All-Americans. Twenty-five men and twelve women have been track and field All-Americans. Last year,

Al Pugh won a national championship in the discus.

"Our kids know about the tradition," said Fry, when asked to explain his success. "I suppose that causes some pressure. But maybe we work a little harder than most people. Maybe we know how to work harder."

That's something that Fry teaches. Fry runs daily with the cross country teams, logging anywhere from six to ten miles with each workout. He swims a thousand yards daily. If he still feels the need to do more, he hits the exercise bike, on which he can work most people under the table.

"The first time my class saw him, he was on sabbatical leave," recalled Slusser. "He came to practice, and Dr. [Lou] Sutton said, 'Do you guys mind if a professor from the music department runs with you today?' We started to laugh, wondering why any professor from the music department would try this. Then he went out and just destroyed us.

"He used to work harder than all of us," Slusser said. "I'm a high-mileage runner, and he did more than me. He was very faithful about running. As freshmen, we couldn't stay with him. By the time we were seniors, we got so we could stay with him, and that's how we knew we'd improved."

That's saying a lot. Today, Fry says he can't stay with the men, that he's content to run with the lead pack of women. In those early days, he could run with anyone. He placed seventeenth at the 1978 New York Marathon and in 1975 won the submasters Olympic 10,000-meter race in Toronto, outdistancing runners from thirty-three countries.

Those accomplishments didn't come easy. The slightly built Fry has had his share of injuries, setbacks that have hampered his training and limited his participation in numerous events. Much of his success has come through his determination to hit the road every day.

"I think one of Ed's greatest attributes is his ability to take average runners who really want to do well and get the most out of them," said Dan Cunkelman, who ran at IUP from 1974 to 1978. "He had a way of getting the best out of athletes. Athletes who were average and who wanted to work, he could really make something out of them."

Maybe that's because Fry is the same kind of runner, a plugger who needs to be running every day. Running with the team does more than keep Fry in shape. He learns about his runners and what makes them tick. If they are tired and need to decrease mileage, he knows it. Finally, that close contact extends outside practice. Fry becomes a friend, someone the runners can count on through thick and thin.

"He's a great role model," said Cunkelman. "We used to go places, and we didn't look at him and say, 'Well, here's the coach, we don't want to be where he is.' He always included us in the things he did, and we always included him in the things we did."

"When he first came to town, he was single," Slusser added. "We used to go for long runs on Fridays, and then he'd take some of the guys and go over to one of the dorms and play Ping Pong. After a while, he'd buy a pizza. He was close with many runners."

This Is REAL Cross Country

Tom Rogozinski's 1992 version of "What I Did During My Summer Vacation" would be a prizewinner in any classroom.

A 1990 graduate of IUP and a former member of the cross country and track and field teams, Rogozinski finished third in the Runner's World Trans America Footrace. The race covered nearly three thousand miles, starting at the Pacific in Huntington Beach, Calif., on June 19 and ending in New York's Central Park on August 22.

The first ocean-to-ocean footrace in over sixty years, the ultramarathon followed a format similar to the Tour de France bicycle race and comprised sixty-four stages, with the best cumulative time winning. The twenty-seven international runners who started in the competitive division normally began their day around 5 a.m. and covered from twenty-eight to sixty-two miles, completing the daily journey in the early afternoon. Fewer than half of those who started finished the race.

The youngest of the runners, Rogozinski spent much of the race in second place. He led during a couple of stages, despite running with a stress fracture in his foot. David Warady, a thirty-five year-old Californian, was the ultimate winner, and thirty-two-year-old Milan Milanovic of Switzerland finished second.

"He came into his own at IUP during his senior year," IUP coach Ed Fry said of Rogozinski. "He just missed All-America status by a few places at the national meet [where he finished twenty-eighth]. He was starting to get involved with ultramarathons before he graduated. He had the capacity to go long. His body type is good. He's built strong. When he first came here, he was built like a linebacker."

Running across the U.S. takes a toll mentally and physically. To combat mental fatigue, Rogozinski relied on his sense of humor. At an aid station in Utah, he and two other runners found a dead snake near a Gatorade cooler. They placed the snake on top of the cooler, making the ultramarathon just a little more memorable for the runners who came after them.

That closeness doesn't evaporate when a runner receives his diploma. Fry and his wife, Betsy, have been invited to sing at the weddings of many ex-IUP runners, Slusser among them. Every July, Fry hosts a picnic and softball game that pits alumni runners against the current team. The fall season begins with the annual alumni meet, a race in which the alumni run against the current team.

"I'll tell you what kind of guy he is," said Slusser. "My younger brother went to college six years after I did. He could have gone anywhere he wanted, but he waited around and missed applying to schools. I called Ed and asked him if he could help in getting him into IUP. Ed spent a day running around campus, going all over the place. My brother wasn't a runner, but Ed spent all that time, and my brother came to IUP.

"You know what he did? He went out for track and competed in the long jump and the 200. He wasn't very good, but he stuck it out for four years. I asked Ed, 'Why did you go to all that bother for someone who wasn't even going to be on your team?' He said, 'It was no problem. It didn't make any difference.'"

A story like that illustrates the biggest difference between Fry and other coaches. It also shows why, year in and year out, Fry and the Indians are winners, no matter what they do on the track. 🐾
